

49°
Overcast

Monday
56° 42°

Tuesday
63° 40°

Wednesday
70° 41°

Thursday
66° 44°

Most Read

- Autopsy found drugs in dead child's system
- Autopsy found drugs in dead child's system
- Mom upset after stranger takes son from school
- Man arrested after parole officer witnesses drug sale
- Former gym owner gets 10-year sentence for drug sales, welfare fraud

Most Commented

- Editorial: State deserves 1 star for customer service
- Police investigate cat shooting
- Mom upset after stranger takes son from school
- Just Beverages agrees to restrictions
- Warren County leaders grapple with meeting 'decorum'

Glens Falls Post-Star

Home / News / Viewpoints / Editorial

EDITORIAL: Place no limits on child sex abuse suits

See it in Print

Berkshire Eagle

Gary Mercure, a former New York priest, stares Feb. 10, 2011, at the jury as a guilty verdict is read after being tried in Berkshire County Superior Court for the rape of two altar boys in the 1980s in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. The Roman Catholic Church is opposing efforts in New York to allow sex abuse accusers to file lawsuits after the statute of limitations as expired.

April 24, 2015 10:00 pm

\(5\) Comments

For its victims, child sex abuse is a lifetime sentence, so we support a bill to eliminate New York's statute of limitations on lawsuits in these situations.

Now, victims of child sex abuse can file a lawsuit up until they turn 23. But their anguish doesn't vanish with their birthday. Their scars don't go away.

The victims must struggle every day to carry the weight of what they endured; why should the perpetrators be allowed, after a few years have passed, to move past the possibility that they could one day be called to account?

Advertisement: Story Continues Below

The chance to get justice is worth preserving.

Truth and justice are ideals, you might think, leaders of the Catholic Church in New York would celebrate.

But despite all the revelations of the past 25 years, the hierarchy of the Catholic Church still is not willing to stand firmly on the side of child victims of adult abusers, especially when those abusers are Catholic priests.

Advertisement: Story Continues Below

The unfortunate truth is that, in many cases of child sexual abuse — including several in our area — Catholic priests have been exposed as the perpetrators.

Church leaders have expressed sympathy for victims, and over time, the church has gotten better about exposing and firing abusive priests. But still the church has put its own interests first, even if that has meant cutting off the only avenue for redress that victims have.

Catholic Church leaders in New York are fighting the bill to eliminate the statute of limitations on lawsuits.

Many victims of sex abuse hide the cause of their suffering. It can take years for them to feel able to speak about what happened, more years to take action. It is cruel to tell people finally coming to terms with their abuse that it's too late, legally, to do anything about it.